Turning 21: Coming of Age
Naomi Tucker, Executive Director

I’ll take any opportunity I can get for renewal. Beginning a new year, a new life stage, marking a transition to a new phase – rituals that mark our growth are precious opportunities to re-envision ourselves, begin anew or strengthen what is already there. In Judaism we delineate age 13 as the moment of transition to adulthood. American culture celebrates that milestone at 21. Regardless of what year you choose, each is an opportunity to pause and reflect – and personally, I’ll take them both, because those reflective moments create openings for positive change.

As Shalom Bayit celebrates 21 years of empowering women and teens, we are exploring what it means for both individuals and organizations to come of age with the right tools to build healthy futures. In our abuse prevention programs we ask: what tools do young people need in order to build a foundation for healthy relationships as they enter adulthood? As an organization, we ask: how do our agency and programs reflect 21 years of experience?

Towards Healthy Relationships

Turning 21 is a critical time. Young people must suddenly be ready to face “the real world.” As parents we worry about our college graduates’ final departure from the nest: Will they stay “out of trouble”? Are they ready to support themselves, get a job, carve a career path? When we pack our kids up for their next phase of life we want to send them off with the right tools and skills. It’s critically important to make sure relationship skills are on that list.

One of the key ways to prevent domestic violence in adult life is to ensure that children learn about healthy and unhealthy relationships before they begin to form their own. Kids need exposure during their early adolescence, and reinforcement throughout their teenage years. If we don’t prepare young people to know what they want, seek out healthy patterns, and recognize red flags, how can we expect them to create healthy relationships?

Reflections on Creating Hope
Rabbi Howard Ruben
Head of School,
Jewish Community High School of the Bay

Creating Hope was an important evening because of the power of stories. There is a story, retold by Ellie Wiesel, about the Baal Shem Tov who had a ritual for seeking protection for his community. The ritual included going to a special spot in the forest, lighting a fire, and saying a particular prayer. With that ritual, the community was protected. Then generations later - long after the place, the fire, and the prayer were forgotten - all that remained of the ritual was this story about it.

Telling the story protected the community. Wiesel concludes by writing, God created humanity because God loves stories. So it was the night of Creating Hope - I was mesmerized by the stories we heard about a community that needs protecting. Shalom Bayit was instrumental in transforming stories of fear and loneliness into tales of courage and hope. I am grateful for Shalom Bayit’s evening of stories to remind me how much God loves those who tell stories and how much work remains to protect the dignity of all in our community.

That’s why we chose to make that topic the focus of our annual Creating Hope benefit dinner this year, highlighting the voices of young people – along with experts in the field – to share what they know about guiding youth towards healthy futures.

Creating Hope

Our annual dinner on May 8th was a powerful evening, with young people and experts in the field teaming together to help us plan for a future free of violence. The sold-out crowd of nearly 300 people was propelled to action by our keynote speakers Esta Soler (Founder and President of Futures Without Violence) and filmmaker Jeffrey Brown (whose upcoming movie SOLD about child trafficking will premier next year), and by young voices alongside them on stage. We were entertained by talented students from Jewish Community High School of the Bay. We heard from young women like Shira Chester and Sarah VanZanten sharing their personal stories of teen dating violence, and from teens as young as 12 spreading a message of respect. Their visions and voices were profoundly inspiring and encouraged all of us to engage in the task of guiding youth towards safe and healthy relationships.

In this newsletter we bring you some highlights from that wonderful evening: from celebratory photos (p.3) to one of the powerful spoken word pieces shared from the stage (p.4), and a guide for teaching healthy relationship skills to young people (p.5). We hope all of these pieces inspire you to pass on a message of hope to the next generation.

Coming of Age as an Organization

In our first decade Shalom Bayit was a small, all-volunteer task force, planning programs from our kitchen tables and meeting women in cafés when they called us to ask for help. We entered our second decade transforming that task force, planning programs from our kitchen tables and extending programs to segments of the community that may not be aware of our services. We’ll be counting on all of you to help us grow in all those ways – and to spread the word about Shalom Bayit within your circles. Because if there is one thing I have for Shalom Bayit’s coming of age, it is that we grow into our next phase of life within a strong community of friends. After all, as Golda Meir said about building Israeli society, “I never did anything alone. Whatever was accomplished in this country was accomplished collectively.”

I dream about picking the lock
the day he deadbolted me into our apartment
I dream about running downstairs revealing my swollen red black and blue face to the guy at the borekas shop

I fantasize about stumbling into the police station
blood not yet dried
under the skin of my forearms
before I showered the evidence off my inner thighs
bumps still protruding from my skull
misplaced mountains
and telling them his name

What if I told my teacher the truth?
Sorry I can’t come to class or meetings all week. My boyfriend beat me so bad last night I can barely walk and my eyelids are so swollen I can barely see and the blows impacted my jaw so hard that it hurts to chew.

I wake up
silence traps me.
I call in sick for a week.
When my concerned program counselor sends me to a therapist,
I say,
“He just gets angry and yells sometimes.”
She tells me
“Unless you want to leave him, there’s nothing I can do for you.”

I remember the first time I ever saw a man hit a woman was in Israel 2 years ago,
and when I asked my roommate to help me call the police
because my Hebrew wasn’t good enough,
he brushed me off
“There’s no point. They won’t do anything.”

So I lay in bed quiet/stomach gnawing smell the borekas baking
but never venture downstairs
never open my mouth
and have a taste

1. Talk to teens about relationships – both healthy and unhealthy. Start this early and often. You can use Jewish text and teachings as a springboard for your conversation.

2. Teach young children about healthy friendships, peaceful conflict resolution, strong communication skills and healthy boundaries.

3. Counter harmful gender stereotypes by teaching girls and boys that beauty comes from within, that they are not defined by others, that every person is in charge of their own body, that it’s OK for boys to cry and express their feelings, and that respect is cool.

4. Ask teens what’s important to them in a healthy relationship – and then genuinely listen to what they have to say.

5. Give information about dating violence and sexual assault – not to alarm, but to inform. Remember that knowledge is power, and it’s good to think in advance about “what you would do if…”

6. Point out things you see out in the world – a movie scene, a music video, an argument you witness at the grocery store – and ask teens for their opinion on what they saw/felt/noticed.

7. Watch what teens are watching and pay attention to what is important to them. Share your opinions, and respect theirs too.

8. Empower kids with the tools they need to protect themselves, as well as the courage to stand up for what they believe in if they witness bullying, harassment or other harmful behaviors. Bring up topics like love, respect, control, consent, dating, peer pressure, and ways technology can help or harm.

9. Bring Love Shouldn’t Hurt workshops to your school, synagogue or youth group. Every teen deserves healthy relationships education!

10. Model healthy boundaries and relationships – in your own family, home, workplace, congregation and community.

Through interactive workshops for middle, high school and college students Love Shouldn’t Hurt helps young people recognize abusive behavior and gain the knowledge and tools to make healthy relationship choices in their future.

Contact us to schedule a teen or parent workshop in your school, synagogue or youth group!

ONE IN THREE TEENS EXPERIENCES ABUSE IN A DATING RELATIONSHIP
One Billion Rising
On February 14th Shalom Bayit staff, board, and volunteers took part in the One Billion Rising event at San Francisco City Hall, the largest global action in history to end violence against women and girls. Women and men in 207 countries came together to dance and RISE up to express their collective outrage towards violence against women.

2nd Annual South Bay Womyn’s Conference
On March 9th Youth Program Coordinator Zephira Derblich-Milea led a workshop on healthy relationships and setting healthy boundaries at San Jose State University. This was the second year that this workshop was offered at the South Bay Womyn’s Conference and we look forward to more in the future!

Strengthening Leadership
Executive Director Naomi Tucker was invited to join two Jewish leadership initiatives this past year. Locally, Naomi was part of UpStart’s leadership cohort for directors of small Bay Area Jewish nonprofits, a project funded by the Walter & Elise Haas Fund. She was also accepted into the Bay Area cohort of Selah, a national leadership development program for Jewish social justice leaders. Selah is a collaborative project of Bend the Arc: A Jewish Partnership for Justice and the Rockwood Leadership Institute. “I have loved being part of these two amazing programs,” Naomi writes, “Both provided valuable training and mentoring to deepen my leadership skills. It is a privilege to learn and grow in a community of colleagues.”
Thank you!
